At the turn of the 20th century, as globalisation has reached the most remote hinterlands, new rounds of economic and political instability have displaced millions of 'economic migrants' and 'political refugees' while leaving others unable to move, thereby reconstituting the social structures of both 'core' centres of wealth and power and the developing world 'periphery'. Increasingly, people in almost every region of the world lead transnational or transregional lives. Their allegiances often straddle particular villages, small towns or cities of countries of origin and specific places in their new 'homelands'. Even when people stay put, their ideas, dreams, everyday work and leisure activities are influenced by cultural practices from outside their home region. How, then, do people make sense of 'home' and 'exile'? This was the topic of an international researcher training course in December 2001. Key questions included:

- The relationship between belonging, identity and mobility
- The way distances produces cultural articulation and culture travels
- The relationship between local and global marginalizat
